Area above door most important because it will immediately attract spectators eye.Important thematic material should thurefore occupy it. Perspectives in area should be such that objects represented accord enough with average visual experience to be a easily grasped. This means that they cannot be shown too much above eye level where acute perspective "foreshortenings" would occur. Horizon line must then be set high on wall, much above spectators actual horizon line. (No problem for spectator. He adjusts auto -matically).But a compositional difficulty arises here because of the two light slots projecting into the two side wings of the wall space. The mural design must operate und eath these slots and yet rise so that it fills the primarily important space above the door.Otherwise stated the horizon line must be low enough to set up significant d forms below light slots but high enough to avoid too acute foreshortenings above door. After a number of trials it was found that placing horizon line at five feet from top of wall space not these conditions. But because of the depth of the vings on each side of door another problem areas. Perspectives at bottom of wall space because To obviate this difficulty the side vings were cut off about four feet from their bases and separate designs effected in the cut off areas. This device (com on enough in old altar paintings) while an outcome of technical considerations permitted the introduction of meeded thematic material 1070 the mural design.

(3) Almost equal in importance to the area above door are these areas immediately to the sides of door in the right and left wings. The lines of the door, which the eye
